To Whom It May Concern,

Lisa Bell was a student a section of SPC 1017 that I taught in Fall 2020. Her alacrity was immediately and consistently obvious. She took the time to offer feedback on shortcomings in the course design and even volunteered to compile suggestions for improvement. Such students are valuable and rare.

I found Lisa to be a frequent and direct communicator. Such assets are useful in ordinary contexts, but even more indispensable in online courses, where it can be difficult to know how students are faring and what challenges they face. So, in many ways, Lisa was the voice of her cohort.

In addition to being a willing communicator, Lisa earned high marks on her assignments. The most significant assignment in the course is an informative speech. Lisa gave an innovative exploration of how pre-Revolutionary law in the American colonies was used to demonize and execute women. This topic is creative and timely, and she managed to connect it to modern-day issues, which was an intellectually impressive feat.

I am proud to have been a part of Lisa's educational journey. I am sure she will continue to do great things, perhaps graduate school or a strong career in the information economy. Please contact me if needed.

Sincerely,

Dr. William Kelvin
